10 april 2016
third sunday of easter (OF year C)
good shepherd sunday (EF)

The early Christians celebrated Mass facing East, facing the rising Sun, which was a powerful symbol of the coming back of the LORD at the end of time. This symbolism was so powerful that churches were designed so that priest and people could face together towards the LORD who would come back from the East. In some cases, most notably in Rome, the altar had a large confessio, a crypt, in front of it, which meant that the priest had to stand behind the altar instead of in front of it in order to face East. The people would turn their backs to the altar at the Consecration, to face East with the priest. Soon, the idea of praying towards physical East was replaced with the idea of praying towards liturgical East. So, prayer was directed towards the Cross on the Altar as a focal point of attention. In most places, that meant the priest and people were on the same side of the altar.

In the early 20th century, scholars posited that the early Christians celebrated Mass facing the people. This has been since proved to be a misreading of the evidence, but the idea was so powerful that, around Vatican II, it was adopted spontaneously all over the world. The rubrics of the Roman Missal, however, still presume that the Mass is celebrated facing liturgical East, as it directs the priest to turn towards the people at certain times during the Mass. [15] Such a direction would be meaningless if the Missal assumed that the priest was always facing the people.

Pope Benedict XVI reminded us that the physical orientation of the altar, the celebrant and the people is not as important as the liturgical and spiritual orientation of the altar, celebrant and people. [16] The celebrant is not the focal center of the Mass, and neither are the people. It is Christ. In many places where the Ordinary Form is celebrated towards the people, a situation called versus populum, a large Crucifix and candles are placed on the altar to impress upon the faithful this principle. While some people associate Mass in the other direction, called ad orientem, with the pre-Vatican II Extraordinary Form, it is the normative position for the Roman Rite. Some people feel uncomfortable with ad orientem worship, because they feel that "the priest's back is to the people" and they "can't see." But once they understand that the priest and people stand together towards the LORD, and that the liturgy is the celebration of a Mystery, as well as the fact that there really is not all that much to see on the altar anyway, then they often begin to experience ad orientem worship more positively.

After Vatican II, many Western Christians experimented with versus populum celebrations in an attempt to encourage greater active participation on the part of the faithful. While that was a noble goal, that objective can still be obtained by celebrating Mass facing liturgical East. In the meantime, in some quarters, the idea has arisen that the Mass is about the community celebrating itself, and not the self-oblation of Jesus to His Father in the Sacrifice of the Mass, the fruits of which we receive in Holy Communion. Around the world, little by little some parishes are discovering that the restoration of ad orientem worship is correcting that peculiarly modern error.

15. please see http://wdtprs.com/blog/2011/11/girm-299-and-the-old-uncorrected-translation/ for a discussion of a faulty translation of GIRM 299 in the 2010 English GIRM. The GIRM tells the celebrant to face the people at certain times in the Mass, which are at paragraphs 78, 124, 138, 146, 154, 157, 165, 181, 185, 243.
